Vail Family Before Temecula - Part 2

Gila Monsters, Snakes, Stampedes Obstacles in Quest to Expand West

By Rebecca Marshall Farnbach

Two greenhorns from the East with good business savvy cashed in on adventure and made their fortunes in frontier Arizona. When they needed more pastureland in 1904 they came to Southern California and bought four former Mexican ranchos, amassing 87,500 acres from Temecula to Lake Elsinore. The enterprise dominated the area economically and was the largest employer. The Temecula bank and other businesses were formed to support the huge Vail Ranch. This is the story of how they happened to settle in California.

(The story continues from last month. . .)

Walter and Edward founded the Empire Land and Cattle Company in 1886. Three years later California entrepreneur Carroll W. Gates bought a half interest in the company. When the Arizona markets for beef collapsed in the mid-1880s, the company found new markets in Kansas City and Los Angeles, and expanded to new grasslands in Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas and California.

Walter faced death in 1890 after he shot a beautifully marked Gila monster and slung it over the saddlebag behind him. After riding a distance, he reached backward, and the reptile that Walter thought was dead bit him. He hurried back to the ranch and someone sent a message for the Southern Pacific Railroad to rush an engine to the mine to take him to Tucson for medical treatment. Walter was seriously ill for several weeks, but eventually recovered from the potentially deadly bite.

Shortly afterward, Walter and Edward led a protest against the same rail line that had saved his life. The Vails needed to get cattle from Arizona to pastures in California. Southern Pacific had sharply raised shipping fees, so the Vails boycotted the railroad and took the stock by cattle drive. Edward, Empire Ranch foreman Tom Turner and eight Mexican ranch hands drove 917 steers from the Empire Ranch in Arizona to the Warner Ranch pastures in California.

They survived a stampede and a perilous crossing of the Colorado River. They recaptured 110 runaway steers, and were detained in Yuma by a sheriff who demanded taxes. After intervention by their Tucson attorney, they followed the old Butterfield Stage Trail and encountered a challenge by Indians. After appeasing the Indians with sugar and coffee beans, they passed through a valley full of rattlesnakes. They traveled the desert at night with a lantern hung on the tailboard of a wagon, which the steers followed “like soldiers.” They stumbled on cattle bones, a broken-down wagon and a human skull. A sheriff approached and shot and killed a young man who had joined them, and took his brother into custody.

After two months and ten days of adventure, the desert drive ended at the Warner Ranch pasturelands. They had lost only two head of cattle while crossing the Colorado River. When the cowboys returned to Arizona, they met with other ranchers to identify a safe route for driving cattle to California. The route was never established, because a Southern Pacific representative attended the meeting and shipping fees were reduced to the previous rates.

The Vails developed one of Arizona’s largest and most influential livestock operations of one million acres and 40,000 cattle, a success mainly attributable to Walter’s business genius and constant supervision. Walter constantly analyzed breeding patterns and sales, and adapted ranch practices to capitalize on trends.

The one room adobe with a dirt floor was transformed into a 22-room home with electricity and indoor plumbing. Walter and Margaret raised seven children there before it was sold in 1928. The house is now listed on the National Registry of Historic Places.

The United States Bureau of Land Management manages the ranch as a conservation area, and allows cattle to graze, by special permit. One of Walter Vail’s great-granddaughters heads the Empire Ranch Foundation, a non-profit historical group that presents educational programs at the ranch.

Two young men from the city came west, seeking adventure. They found it and amassed a fortune, too. None of the dangers of frontier life killed them, not Apaches, Gila monsters or fights over a yellow dog.

In tragic irony, streetcars provided Walter’s initial investment and also killed him. At age fifty-seven, with his empire at its zenith, he was fatally injured when two Los Angeles crushed him. His five children ran his business empire in Southern California, including the massive Vail Cattle Ranches of Temecula, Imperial Valley and Santa Rosa Island and real estate holdings in Huntington Beach.

Edward Vail never married. He stayed in Arizona where he regaled listeners with stories of his early life in the Arizona Territory. He served as president of the Arizona Pioneer Historical Society and died in 1936 at the age of 87.
